The baker looked full of woe. He moaned and groaned. The loaves had burned. They had burned even though he had followed all the instructions. He had been careful when rolling out the dough. He had used lovely, fresh herbs and also sundried tomatoes. He had put the loaves in the oven, below the biscuits he was baking. He had started to make a cake and had just broken two eggs, as he needed the yolks. He was so focused, he didn't notice the smoke billowing out of the oven. When he turned around to check, he almost choked on the smoke and it tickled his throat. There was flour all over his clothes. He sighed, 'I suppose I had better start again or there won't be a loaf for lunch tomorrow.'
